A Book Review
by Ileana Randasu, MD, PhD

This is the first book in the world having this title. It makes up the grounds of a new medical science of the homeopathic drug. The first issue of the book appeared in 2007. The third edition is revised and has some additional new chapters.

The main idea of starting the construction of the new science was, although ignored until now, the homeopathic drug, the essence of homeopathy as a therapeutic method. The existence of homeopathy can't be conceived without resorting to the homeopathic drug. The same relation is between allopathy and the allopathic drug. And the allopathic drug is the object of its own science, Pharmacology.

Following the illumination of the objective necessity of the existence of homeopathic Pharmacology, the beginning can only be the elaboration of a General Pharmacology. It contains the scientific analysis of the general notions which forms the specific vocabulary of the particular science.

As this is the first book of a new domain of medical sciences, the author considered useful to write one unconventional book, with two parts. He reserved the second part for homeopathic pharmacology. The book is build on the fundamental idea of the existence of a perfect analogy between allopathy and homeopathy. The author conceived the first part with some introductory chapters, with enunciations, reasonings, justifications. This first part covers an interesting and instructive route, from general (nature, science) to particular (pharmacology, homeopathy, allopathy). Here are discussed controversies in connection with homeopathy, original contributions of the book, the consequences of the existence of the homeopathic pharmacology as a medical science.

The second part contains general homeopathic pharmacology. The following chapters are dealt with in successive chapters: pharmacokinetics, pharmacodynamics, pharmacotoxicology, pharmacography, pharmacotherapeutics, pharmacoepidemiology. In each chapter there are presented the correspondent aspects of allopathic pharmacology, to permit to reader to compare the two pharmacologies. The content of the chapters is drawn up on the base of the literature concerning homeopathy, presented and discussed in one logic order, from a pharmacological viewpoint.

The book is one pleading in the favour of the existence of one single concept of the drug and of an unique science of the drug, Pharmacology, with two analogue branches, allopathy and homeopathy, corresponding to the two types of drugs.

The book includes some annexes. In annex 1 there are the positive results obtained by the author using 3 original homeopathic drugs, obtained on the basis of the law of similitude at molecular and cellular level, elaborated by the author himself. Annex 2 analyses the problem of the modern homeopathic proving. Annex 3 includes one essay of the author "Drugs in the XXI century".
